and if after all when we have made trial of the system we find it unsatisfactory, we can always withdraw and go back to the old method.

This enquiry into the case of Pola suggests quite a number of points which the public mind is inclined to. Taking the matter of suicide, we find it advanced by several persons that suicide is a preventable disease, whereas to the case where man commits what is known as voluntas, so that suicides when in a sound state of mind, are very rare. Looking over an article in the Contemporary Review upon this subject we find that the number of suicides in Prussia, only one-fourth are attributed to insanity; therefore in Prussia it is evident that the public offices consider those-fourths of the people commit suicide when in full possession of their faculties. In England, we are well aware that parties retain a variety of temporary insanity in almost every case, but this after all is a more legal quality, as by doing this they save the property to the heirs, a verdict of de mortuis confirms the property to the crown.

A gentleman who had heard signed because he had heard that leading men had signed, had it been known that the woman was his wife, did not think that the man deserved the blame and contempt of his fellow-men, we are certain that such blame attaches to the members of the committee.

We must take exception to the imputation that the Committee on Pardons is actuated by political motives. It is to us a matter of regret that any political motives should be attributed to a committee which has been appointed to inquire into the conduct of the public officers.

King Kalakaua, when under examination, stated the other day, that the man who committed suicide was a member of the royal household.
